Objective: To teach the past participle as a modifier.

Sentence: "I stayed at a hotel built one hundred years ago"

Text: Sunshine 3, p. 58

Time: 20-25 minutes

Materials: Sheet F, 9 large copies.
The clues from Sheet G cut into strips. Tape.
Various pictures.

Summary: In a team, some students will find information hidden around the room and relate it verbally to another student, who will write to complete the worksheet.

Procedure: Using pictures of famous people and various items, practice making sentences using the target grammar. If you have a picture of a dress and Ayumi Hamasaki, you can help the students make the sentence: "This is the dress worn by Ayumi." You can work up to this sentence using simpler examples:

This is Ayumi's dress.

This dress is worn by Ayumi.

This is the dress worn by Ayumi.

As you are explaining this concept, the other teacher should be stealthily taping the clues around the room, (or you can reverse these roles, depending on your preference.) Give a few more examples until the students understand or the clues have all been placed, whichever comes last.

Then, have students make groups of four, (or three or five if necessary). As they are accustomed to making lunch groups, this request may cause some initial confusion, but they will likely prevail in the end. You should end up with nine groups. Have each group choose a writer who will remain seated, and the others are runners, who will run around the room and try to find the information, and relate it verbally back to the writer. The first group to find all of the information wins. Be sure to practice reading the sentences after everyone has finished.

Notes: If you are working with low-level students, it may be more effective to have them work in lunch groups instead of groups of four.
